LENGTH, 520 FEET.

She now advertises for a typewriter and a maid to suit herself. The next scene shows Jack at the man-icuring parlor. While flirting with the fair damsel Mrs. Jack arrives and breaks up the tete-a-tete. When Jack comes home he finds a new servant; this almost gives him a fit. When he comes to his office he finds the new typewriter which gives him nervous prostration.

While the wife leaves the dining room Jack, the gay old boy, kisses the maid. He is surprised by his wife who discharges the maid, and gives a good lecture to Jack. The next scene shows Jack at his office busy with his pretty typewriter. Mrs. Jack arrives, discharges the typewriter and gives another lecture to Jack.

He goes out to spend a night at the roof garden theatre. When he comes home his wife delivers a curtain speech, not even stopping for breath. Jack tells her to shut up, and as she seemingly does not want to do this, Jack shuts her up in her folding bed.

A young married couple start their married life by living at the home of the bride's father. The old gentleman suffers from a bad attack of gout and ill-temper and "Auntie," a maiden of many summers, objects to the liberties the young couple take with the house. She prods the old man on till he drives them out bag and baggage. Auntie is triumphant.

Then they fix up their "own little flat." Everything goes well for a while until a day comes when they cannot pay the furniture man. He calls in his assistants and they proceed to take everything, leaving only a few draperies belonging to the wife. These she proceeds to use, with some old boxes and barrels from the kitchen until the place presents a very fair appearance, but anybody unfortunate enough to sit on it is sure to take a tumble. Father-in-law calls and after taking a few tumbles leaves in a highly excited state. A theatrical manager also calls and offers a part in his company to the young wife. This she accepts and makes an instantaneous hit. When the father takes her back home "Auntie" proceeds to once more show her authority, but is summarily fired out bag and baggage.
